PASHA'S SNUFF BOXES.

Some half a dozen years previous to the sudden collapse of the Napoleonic dynasty, in 1870, a certain sensation was . 200 excited in Paris by the arrival in that city of an oriental potentate of ambigu-ous nationality, but popularly known and spoken of as "the pasha." Whether he came from Turkey or from Egypt was undoubtedly the possessor of an immense fortune; and, secondly—no slight recommendation in the Lutetian capital-that he spoke French with tolerable fluency. As a matter of course so desirable an acquisition to Parisian society became the lion of the hour, and no sooner was it ascertained that a spacious hotel overlooking the Park de Monceaux had been engaged and furnished for the reception of his excelleney and suite than a shoal of visitors official and non-official, hastened to inscribe their names in a book deposited for the purpose in the porter's lodge. Every day brought a fresh installment of signatures, until before a week had elapsed the list threatened to rival in length the traditional catalogue of Lepo-

Hussein Pasha-an assumed title, I fancy, but the only one by which he was generally known-was short and corpulent, of sallow complexion and reserved manners; he spoke little, but what he did say was concise and to the point. He was extremely observant, but chary of expressing his opinion of what he saw or heard-only one instance being recorded of a temporary departure from his habitual taciturnity. Having been persuaded by a member of the French Jockey club to accompany him to the opera, he was escorted between the acts by his cicerone to the foyer de la danse, thereby occa-Send on your answers to the ditch sioning great excitement among the corps sum.
